

Insert Catchy Title Here! - Matt Hughes
You should have one for your blog analysis. If you don't, you should come up with something inviting, thought-provoking, or welcoming to bring your audience in.

Seriously folks, don't forget your name!

Consider a caption to your video, or this guy might step on your foot - Ouch!

One thing I've been thinking about a lot lately is how to design guidelines for an exhibition web page. The more I think about the task, the more complex it appears. Because of the elements involved, and the personal nature of the web site, I think a series of guidelines would be more appropriate than a rigid format we are all required to follow. Although I do have several specific requirements, it will be up to you to design an inviting, sexy web page.

Lets get right to the three basic requirements. You need to showcase your video, full text of your Blog Analysis, and provide a link to your blogs. Check out the slick model I've written up for you! Things like a sexy title and flashy, creative links are important too, but are standing in line behind the "big three" mentioned above.

There are also a series of constraints to consider. First, students are using a variety of web-based applications to run their DP. Weebly, Webs, Blogger, and iWeb are a few, and each have their own advantages and disadvantages. A lot of the drag-and-drops don't allow you too many layout options, and it can be tough to do basic things like wrap your text around an image. Readability is another issue. It can sometimes be difficult to read text on a web page, so we will all have to be very conscious of elements such as background, font, formatting, color, and the like. Play around with these tools a bit until you find a look you like. Show a friend. If it gives them a seizure, change it. The basic rule we should all live by is: "Would I read this?"

Remember, you are not finished until you have linked to your DP and emailed me your web page url at matt.hughes@animashighschool.com As always, let me know if you have any questions!
